SYNOPSIS:

Lyla's thrilled when Sam proposes. But when Sam's mother dies in a bizarre car accident, Sam believes it was his father than arranged for her murder. Sam can't marry Lyla until he knows the truth. Lyla must deal with Sam's family's unfortunate family dynamics, an SUV that seems to follow her everywhere, and her own mother's increasingly strange behavior.

In spite of Lyla's attempts to deflect her growing suspicions, her relentless pursuit of each clue leads to the horrifying conclusion that it was her own mother who was the murderer. After her mother's arrest, Lyla's forced to break up with Sam. There's no way she can marry him now.

“My heart beats as one with the bulls I conquer.”

She joins him one last time to apologize to his father for so unfairly accusing him. She's shocked to learn that the SUV that's been following her belongs to his brother Andy. She confronts Andy and ultimately forces him to reveal that he had hired her mother to kill his mother because she was going to strip him and his father of their livelihood.

The realization that there was a criminal in Sam's family as well as her own is a game changer for Lyla. No longer the sole-guilty-by-association partner, she tells him they're now even. They each had a family member involved in the murder. Instead of taking on the consequences of the tragedy alone, they could try to face it together.

Lyla convinces Sam that they deserve a chance at happiness. She proposes. He accepts. They'll help each other to recover, move on and forge their own lives and futures together.
